MANAGER'S COMMENT

Fiat Chrysler Automobiles (FCA) and PSA Group (formerly PSA Peugeot Citroen) entered into a merger agreement in December 2019. The merger itself should be concluded by the end of the first quarter of 2021. The new group will then become the fourth-largest OEM by size and third largest by revenue. It will have a well-diversified revenue base, with around 46% of income coming from Europe and 43% from North America. Furthermore, the new company will be present in all automobile segments, from small passenger cars to pick-up trucks, and cover the range from mass-market brands to premium and luxury products. The merged group will operate under well-known brands such as Fiat and Peugeot in Europe, and Jeep and Chrysler in North America.

FCA came to the bond market to refinance some existing debt, with the securities offering an attractive yield level compared to the BB-rated universe and also compared to the bonds issued by PSA group. As the combined group will have a better business and financial profile than FCA on a stand-alone basis, the new bonds' yields will converge to those of PSA, meaning a nice upside for those new bonds. The funds took this opportunity to take up a small exposure to FCA.
